Foreword

As of December 2017, the University of Pittsburgh Journal of Technology Law & Policy (“TLP”) will publish one issue per year. Articles, essays, and other submissions will be reviewed and, if accepted, published on a rolling basis. The editors of TLP expect that direct submissions will be reviewed and an accept/reject decision made within ten days of submission. It is expected that accepted submissions will be edited and published within approximately ten weeks of notification of acceptance by TLP and an undertaking by the author(s) to publish the work with TLP.

The motivation for the switch to a rolling publication model is to establish a shorter timeline from submission to publication. We anticipate that the model will encourage the production and publication of research and scholarship in a greater variety of formats, from short essays and policy analyses to longer, deeper scholarly works, and will support researchers who wish to publish work directed to time-sensitive policy issues.
